5. General Guidelines

Business Unit Safety and Well-being team should:

- Identify programs to promote mental health, as well as to identify, evaluate, control and follow-up on psychosocial risks. These programs should be aligned with relevant regulations issued by the competent authorities in each country, as well as with Business Units own occupational Safety & Well-being programs. These programs should include actions such as: mental health and emotional support lines or telemedicine programs.
- Protocols to provide support to associates reintegrations into the workplace after a leave of absence.
- Provide adequate safety and wellness training for associates in the use of new technologies which may challenge their performance.
- Have a trained working group: As defined by the Safety & Well-being leader, that includes a variety of cross-functional leaders, for example: People leader, Labor Relations leader and, the leader of Occupational Health Staff / Plant Physician, where appropriate.
- Be responsible for implementing, following up and evaluating the actions defined in this policy.
- Promote communication and training of leaders and associates on mental health programs and psychosocial factors management, their impact on health, life balance, work environment and business productivity issues.
- Ensure the physical and mental health factors in all incident investigations, such as:
 - Workload management
 - Work demands
 - Training
 - Protection to the physical safety and other stressors, as identified by associates.
 - Violence, bullying and harassment
 - Leadership exercise
 - Workplace environmental conditions
 - External factors
- In the event of severe incidents or high-impact events (e.g., natural disasters), mental health support should be offered to the associates to avoid post-traumatic stress.

All associates should:

- Govern their behavior pursuant to the GGB-001 Code of Ethics, with the GGB-009 Global Diversity and Inclusion Policy, with the GGB-018 Global Policy on the Prevention of Harassment and Discrimination and this policy. Treat their co-workers and managers according to the Golden Rule (Respect, Fairness, Trust and Fairness).
- Participate in events focused on mental health or seek the advice of a medical practitioner determined by the local regulations.
- Report, through the Speak Up line, any practice inconsistent with our Beliefs or does not contribute to a favorable workplace environment or any type of mistreatment, forced labor or improper conduct.

All managers, regardless of their seniority or workplace, should:
